mitochondrial carrier proteins from yeast and human. Mitochondrial carrier proteins (MCPs) provide the biochemical machinery for uptake of ATP into the mitochondria. Transport of a substrate through an MCP is modulated by the membrane potential of the inner mitochondrial membrane and the pH of the matrix and cytoplasm. The basic architecture of mitochondrial carriers is generally conserved across evolution and these structures are well-described for bacterial and viral carriers. However, little is known about the dynamic behavior of the eukaryotic MCPs. We review the current understanding of the biogenesis of yeast and human mitochondrial carriers, focusing on the protein-lipid interactions and the determinants for ATP-binding and transport.1.
